Centre lands funds for child development

said the funds support workers to help them learn if they have physical or cognitive development delays, or social or emotional challenges.

The program services all First Nations of Southern Vancouver Island, and the wait lists for children to join are long.

"We stop taking names when the list is at 25, so it's hard to assess actual need in the region," Rice said.

According to the Ministry of Child and Family Development, the Victoria Native Friendship

Centre is one of 83 organizations across the province that will be sharing $30 million in funding over the next three years to expand and enhance their Supported Child Development and Aboriginal Supported Child Development programming for families with children with extra support needs.

"I'm happy we can do this work, and work with families in this way," Rice said. "I think we're happy to be able give them the tools to succeed in life."
